BEACONSFIELD'S SPEECHES—DANTE AND EVANGELINE—ARNOLD AND STE. BEUVE. The promised volumes of Lord Beaconsfield's

peeches, selected, arranged, and edited by Mr. T. E. Kebbel, have appeared with the imprint of Messrs. Longmans. The Athenoum calls them "portly." If to be tall and narrow, and rather thinand trimmed exceedingly close, is to be portly, then these two octave volumes are portly; otherwise not. The first criticism one has to make on the selection is that it is a selection. Lord Beaconsheld deserves a more complete record than this, If if be impossible and undesirable to republish every speech he ever made, it was most desirable, and one would hope not altogether impossible, to republish all the more important. Mr. Kebuel does not pretend to have done this. He has printed in all about seventy speeches; less than one and a half per year for the period they cover. The selection, moreover, is the work of an avowed partisan, and is open to the remark that it has been made not so much to exhibit Lord Beaconsfleid in full, as to exhibit the best of him. To put it in another way, not all the Disraelis and Beaconsfields we have known are here, but only some of them; those who will best bear the keenness of postbumous scrutiny and hand him down to posterity with somewhat fewer inconsistencies and eccentricities than really belong to him. There never lived a man who turned his back on himself so often as Lord Beaconsfield. Mr. Kebbel has spent some ingenuity on the problem how to present nothing but a front view of this perpetually revolv-ing figure. Lerd Beaconsfield would hardly have thanked him for his pains. For mere consistency, mere straightforwardness, he had an Oriental contempt. He would not have troubled himself to suppress his declaration of yesterday that a thing was black, because to-day he had pronounced it white.

That, however, may be passed over. If Mr. Kebbel formed a capricious conception of his editorial duties, it is open to some future student of this strange personality to form and carry out a different one. And as to publishing a selection only, in stead of a collection, Mr. Kebbel may perhaps plead that a publisher could be found for the one and could not for the other. Nobedy reads speeches now, say the magnates of Paternoster Row. But Mr. Kebbel's notion of the functions of an editor is in some other respects a very imperfect one. It is very doubtful whether the topical arrangement he has adopted is a good one for speeches. Classification is the pet crotchet of the day, thanks to a pre-dominant scientific influence. But the student or casual reader will seldom care to have a complete exhibition of all that Mr. Disraeli said on a given subject. On none was he an authority. There was no single political question of the first magnitude in his time which Mr. Disr. eli took the trouble to master. The one department of political life in which he was preciment-the conduct of party and of a Parliamentary majority or mi nority-is not one about which speeches are made. The result of this accumulation of harangues or particular topics is not to enlarge one's idea of their author's political knowledge or political sagacity The method it affords of studying the secret his real greatness is a very defective and unsatisfactory method. One would have liked to follow, not Mr. Disraeli's speculations on various political puzzles, but the greatest puzzle of all—the man himself. A chronological arrangement would have been far more helpful for such a purpose as that.

Notes are wanting, moreover. Mr. Kebbel's introductions are studiously moffensive, but they are also inadequate. Mr. Disraell's speeches are peculiarly in need of such aids for the reader from their want of fulness of knowledge. And there is no index. The best that can be said of these volumes is that they do supply the means of reading with some convenience a considerable number of the best speeches of Lord Beaconsfield. I leave untouched the greater of Lord Beaconsfield's oratorical qualities, though it is one on which there is much to be said. It may be discussed quite as usefully after the present reprint has made its due impression on the public. Readable the speeches are to a degree, and read they will be I don't doubt. They will possibly enhance Lord Beaconsfield's fame as a rhetorician and as a debater of ingenuity and resource. But to apply to him the word orator is to limit the meaning of the word orator and

A translation of Dante's "Inferno" into Greek by a Turk and published in England is surely a novelty in literature. His Excellency Musurus Pacha is indeed a Turk only by adoption, but it is hard to speak of a man who for twenty years or more has represented the Sublime Porte, and more Sublime Sultan, at the Court of St. James, as any thing but an Ottoman, pure and simple. Nor had he been publicly known as a Dantean, or even as an Italian scholar, before the app arance of this version. I believe the truth is that no many years age Musurus found himself in need f some permanent distraction and occupation, and so betook himself to Dante. His rendering is a sort of tour de force. The Greek is not modern but ancient Greek, and yet not Greek that any one Greek living in any one country or at one period would have written. He has taken, if not all knowledge, the whole of a language in its successive stages of development to be his province, and, for the purpose of this translation, his property. Not finding even that sufficient, he has added some words of his own invention. With all this he has thrown over the the metrical scheme of Greek versification, ignoring the existence of such a thing as quantity, and falling back upon the pronunciation and accentuation used by the modern Greek; the accents indicating on what syllable of each word the stress is laid An odd jumble altogether, one might say. But when an Ambassador and the Dean of the Diplomatie Corps deigns to occupy his leisure with literature, politeness demands that the result should be respectfully reviewed. Reviewed it is, accordingly, with decorum, and with some successful efforts at praise. Who is likely to read it except the reviewers, we are not told. Mr. Longfellow's countrymen may be interested in knowing that his Turkish Excellency has adopted the line-for-line scheme of translation which the American poet preferred; which was also that of Sir Frederick Pollock. The latter shares with Mr. Gladstone the distinction of being equally at home in Greek and Italian, and is the author of the most elaborate and learned criticism which has appeared on Musurus's performarce-that of The Saturday Review.

Messrs. Cassell & Co., who publish the so-called edition de luxe of Mr. Longfellow's "Evangeline," are now advertising it copiously by help of a letter signed by Mr. Longfellow. One must assume that this is a genuine letter, but there is something startling in Mr. Longfellow's remark that the paper and print remind him of the publications of Bodoni, "the famous printer of Parma, who gloried in his art." If Mr. Longfellow will take a fresh look at, say, the folio Horatius of 1791, and then contrast the rather squat and common type of this Evangeline with the elegant letter of the Duke's printer, he will perhaps think his eulogy overstrained. Bodoni is not much in fashion in these days, partly because he printed big books, partly because his texts are not too correct. But, take his books merely as specimens of bookmaking, and his well-proportioned pages have an air of refinement and distinction seldom discernible in the pretentions publications of to-day. It is startling, also, to find that Mr. Longfellow's health is so infirm as this epistle denotes. One would hesitate to attribute to anything but ill health the inability to compose with correctness a letter six lines long.

But a letter of compliment need not be scrutinized too closely. Naturally enough, Mr Longfellow is flattered by the attention paid to a work of his own which he regards with affection. The poem is still a popular one with his admirers, though it is twenty years since Mr. Matthew Arnold singled out Mr. Longfellow's hexameters as examples for the translator of Homer to avoid, "The translator of Home must not," said the great critic, "follow the model offered by Mr. Longfellow in his pleasing and popular poem of Evangeline: for the merit of the manper and movement of Evangeline, when they are at their best, is to be tenderly elegant; and their fault, when they are at their worst, is to be lumbering but Homer's defect is not lumberingness, neither is tender elegance his excellence." The verdict of Mr. Arnold has never been reversed or disturbed. When Evangeline appeared, some too eager worshippers of its author made haste to announce that the hexameter had been naturalized in English; it was henceforth to be a fanciul and useful metre. Perhaps it would not be too much to say that Evangeline has had an effect contrary to that. It has definitely discouraged the use of that verse. The youthful American might well ask himself, and apparently did, what the chances were of his succeeding where Mr. Longfellow had failed.

Mr. Arnold's remarks on Evangeline are from his three Oxford lectures "On Translating Homer," I transcribe them from a copy which is perhaps the most interesting extant; given by the author to Ste. Beuve, whose autograph is on the fly-leaf and whose pencil-marks are scattered through the thin little volume. From which marks and from a note or two one is pleased to infer that the admirable Frenchman had read the book which Mr. Arnold-then a less famous man than now-had him. I should hardly like to say how many works by what renowned writers, by them offered to other renowned writers I have seen for sale on the quais in the lifetime of the latter, the leaves of them all unopened. Mr. Arnold's "Homer" was sold with the rest of Ste. Benve's books not long after his death. Some of them I bought at the time. This was sent me the other day by an old friend living in Paris, who probably had picked it out of the bookstalls on the quais where it had wintered and summered for nobody knows how long before his pious hand rescue it and gave it shelter, and sent it to keep company with some of its old comrades.

HISTORICAL LITERATURE:

A MANUAL

Comprising Brief Descriptions of the most Important Histories in English, French and German, together with Practical Suggestions as to Methods and Courses of Historical Study. For the Use of Students, General Renders and Collectors of Books, By Charles Kendall Adams, LL.D., Professor of History in the University of Michigan. Crown Svo.

What histories shall I read with most profit? What historiwhat histories shall I put into the hands of my sou and my daughter! What course and what methods will be nosst advantageous to our historical club! What histories shall we buy for our town and college libraries! What shall I buy for my own! These questions have often been asked, and search has been made in vain for a volume that would answer them.

. . In the preparation of this work, the aim has been to furnish such information about desirable books as the historical reader and student is likely to profit by, and to suggest the proper methods and order of using the materials so Indicated .- [Extract from Preface.
